Providing information to parents about community services, such as social service agencies, was the only one of these topics that varied by any school characteristics. Information on community services was related to school size, urbanicity, and minority enrollment. While 76 percent of small schools reported offering this information to parents, more than 90 percent of moderately sized and large schools did so ( figure 2 ). Similarly, 78 percent of rural schools provided such information, compared to 93 percent of schools in cities. In addition, nearly all ( 95 percent ) of schools with minority enrollments of 50 percent or more offered community service information to parents, while 81 percent of those with very low minority enrollments ( less than 5 percent ) do so.
